The Health Care Landscape

Unlike some dying industries, the health care field is here to stay. For that reason alone, many professionals-to-be are looking into a health care school in order to jump on the lucrative bandwagon. Beyond becoming a doctor, the demand is strong for health care workers across the board. From nursing to administration and everything else in between, a health care program can get you started on a reliable career in health care. Health Care School Demands

Victoria Clinton, coordinator of the medical assisting department for the San Mateo County Community College district, says many schools have had to accommodate for the increasing need of nurses. "The outlook for employment in the medical field remains excellent. In 2004 the department and faculty moved from the College of San Mateo to a brand new facility at Canada College," she explains. "The Medical Assisting Department in the San Mateo County Community College district has been serving the medical community since 1964." And a brand new facility for the health care program was built on the campus of Canada College in 2004 to meet student demand.
