

Proper care can keep trees healthy help them thrive 7 hrs ago

Planting.

To thrive, a tree needs to be in the right place to take in nutrients, avoid damage and grow to full size. The first thing to look at is your soil. Its pH and density can affect how well the tree draws nutrients from the ground.

Proper spacing is key. Make sure you're not planting the tree too close to the house, sidewalk, patio or other obstructions.

Dig a wide planting hole, but not a deep one. If planted too deeply, the tree's trunk tissue can come in contact with the soil, causing it to rot.

Pruning.

Topping is the worst of the bad ways to prune, because it cuts off much of the tree's food-making capability.

When topped, a tree hurriedly grows new branches and leaf area to sustain itself, but this new, weaker growth is attached to the topped branches, which have begun to decay.

There also are good and bad times to prune. Spring generally is not a good time, Jorgenson
